

MARBLE

The process of transforming stone from quarries into cut-to-size slabs involves several steps that require precision and expertise. Quarrying is the first step, where the stone is extracted from the earth using specialized equipment. The blocks of stone are then cut into large, uniform slabs using large saws. Depending on the type of stone, treatment may be applied to improve its strength and durability. Next, the slabs undergo surface finishing through a series of machines to achieve the desired finish. Quality control is conducted to ensure that the slabs meet the required standards for size, thickness, and appearance. Once the slabs are finished, they are cut into the desired sizes and shapes using specialized machinery. Finally, the cut-to-size pieces are finished with a final surface treatment before being packaged and shipped to their final destination. Each step of the process requires specialized knowledge and equipment, resulting in a high-quality end product.
